SOUTH KOREA SOCIAL CUSTOMS AND ETIQUETTE TIPS

Meeting & Greeting

- > Bowing is the traditional way to greet in South Korea
- > Handshakes often accompany the bow among men
- > Your left hand should support your right forearm when shaking hands
- > Korean women do not always shake hands and may slightly nod instead of a full bow
- > Always bow to individuals when departing

Personal Space

- > It is insulting for Koreans to be touched by someone with whom they are unfamiliar; don't pat them on the back or hug them
- > Prolonged, direct eye contact can be inferred as a challenge and is seen as impolite, especially when dealing with others of a higher social standing
- > Keep your body within its own personal space; avoid extended or crossed legs and limit arm movements when explaining something so as to evade others' personal space
- > If calling someone over to you do not point with your index finger, instead use your hand palm down in a claw movement

- > In cities (especially Seoul) pushing, shoving and touching are regular occurrences – don't be offended by the lack of apologies
- > Friends, of both sexes, will often walk arm in arm together, especially teenagers and the younger generations

Communication style

- > Communication can be complicated in South Korea due to an inherent dislike of saying 'no' as it is considered poor etiquette
- > Discussions can be prolonged due to the avoidance of declining or refusing
- > If disquiet is verbally or visibly displayed it is a sure sign that something is amiss
- > Good posture and positive body language is most beneficial in meetings; patience and politeness must be maintained throughout
- > Do not use excessive or overt body language. Use two hands, or support your right arm with your left, when passing on business cards, gifts, or when receiving an item
- > Respect, trust and satisfaction are displayed through a deeper bow
